In German literature two of the most internationally renowned writers are the dramatist Bertolt Brecht and the novelist Anna Seghers. Both Brecht and Seghers were leading authors in the GDR where the theory of socialist realism was a fundamental principle. Brecht's epic theatre became a major influence on the Western theatre of the twentieth century while the works of Anna Seghers remain the best interpretation of socialist realism. By studying Brecht's plays and the novels of Seghers, the students are expected to grasp concepts such as Sozialistischen Realismus, Verfremdungseffekt, Episches Theater and Aristotelisches Theater. The course is intended to provide a deeper understanding of the development of Western theatre as well as the theory and practice of socialist realism.

This course introduces the student to a specialized study of a particular literary movement, in this case the „baroque“. This period carries the strong impact of the 30 Years' War between Catholicism and Protestantism; the chosen example from literature also exposes the general trend that prevailed in the German society of the period to imitate French culture and the comic effect emanating from it. The unbridled urge for worldly life and the awareness of its vanity stand in conflict with each other and is revealed as a characteristic feature of war times in general with its indefiniteness, pestilence, deaths and the like. The baroque period, long considered interesting only for its architecture, has proved itself equally interesting for literature too in the wake of the Second World War.

Modern German literature is a result of the direct and indirect influence of the pan-European Romantic period. In Germany the Romantics created a revolution in art, politics and life, often in opposition to older, more established authors. A study of German literature would, therefore, be inconceivable without a detailed analysis of this important epoch that laid the foundation for most of the major works of German literature in coming generations. In this course students will also be expected to focus upon the historical background of the Romantic period, its origin, its development and the contributions of its major writers.
